Dear Alumni and Friends:

It is a delight for me to greet all of you as I prepare for my tenure as president of Regis University. Certainly one of the strengths of Regis over the past two decades has been the support and commitment of our alumni and friends, and I look forward to working with each one of you.

When I reflect on my 17 years at Regis, it occurs to me that very few institutions have seen the dramatic changes we have experienced. In the public eye, there has been a good deal of attention paid to our explosive growth. My particular focus, however, is on the academic quality of the programs we have developed under Fr. Clarke's guidance.

My interviews during the presidential search process renewed my longstanding belief that there is high quality at Regis in faculty, in staff, in students, in alumni, and in programs. And we will continue to emphasize academic quality and quality of service in the programs we offer and develop.

I am excited about the challenges that lie ahead for all of us in the Regis University family. I ask for your continued support and commitment as we move into 1993.

Sincerely,

Michael J. Sheeran, S.J.

Preparing for the Global Century

anagement in the '90s is a difficult challenge. Operating in a complex, global environment, successful management requires an educational base which recognizes a chaotic, unpredictable global business climate.

How American business is responding to these global events is reflected in today's current literature, in industry surveys, and in colleges and universities across the nation. Topical buzz words and phrases such as multinational corporations, globalization, cultural diversity, self-managed teams, market-driven economies, and leadership, further illustrate these trends.

Stanley Davis, management consultant and author of Future Perfect, contends that, "... tomorrow's manager will have to know how to operate in an anytime, anyplace universe." Futurist Alvin Toffler's Powershift defines the new corporate structure as being "... a flex-firm to draw information, people, and money from one another and from outside organizations to provide the proper mix in dealing with timely management issues."

Corporate communities nationwide have provided solicited feedback to the academic community, which in turn, are being incorporated into their academic programs. For example, the University of Pennsylvania's Wharton Business School acknowledged this feedback when they radically altered their graduate business program as a result of their 1990 corporate study. The results exemplified the most revolutionary departure from traditional business school education since the early 1960s: placing more emphasis on people skills, adding more global perspective, fostering creativity and innovation, promoting real-world problem-solving, and examining business issues from the viewpoint of several disciplines. Wharton's Dean concluded that, "We needed to get closer to the business of business."

The University of Chicago Graduate School of Business currently offers educational programs in negotiation tactics, team building, and other related skills in people management. A business study conducted by the school recommended that courses be designed "with practical applications in mind." The changes recognized that many of their students wanted utility, not just economic philosophy.

In 1978, Regis introduced this focus into a state-of-the-art accelerated undergraduate program, Regis Career Education Program (RECEP), for working adults. Incorporated into its course content are timely issues, such as ethical decision making, total quality management, and gender issues.

In the SPS Master of Business Administration (MBA) program, an international emphasis is offered. This emphasis is designed to provide students with a traditional background in those critical skill areas necessary to manage business activity in the increasingly global economy. International Marketing, International Financial Management, Managerial Leadership, and Issues in International Law expose the student to timely global issues. These emphases provide in-depth consideration of the specific problems and challenges facing international business activity in the 1990s and beyond.

In the Master's degree program in Nonprofit Management (MNM), the program has expanded its curriculum to include philanthropic studies and nonprofit organizational management with an international perspective. The program will be enhanced by utilizing insights from Israeli nonprofit organizations to encompass ideas, thoughts and trends into its curriculum.

Recognizing that management in the future demands more diverse management/leadership skills, the School developed a degree program in 1989 focusing specifically on leadership. The program was created based on market research and was designed to meet specific curriculum outcomes. The Master of Science in Management (MSM) leadership program, addresses the question: "What will your organization look like in the year 2000 and beyond—the Global Century?" The accelerated degree focuses on a holistic and contemporary course of study for a rapidly changing global marketplace.

Rather than offering traditional courses, the program centers on qualitative issues of management and leadership. By emphasizing critical thinking, risk-taking, and instituting change, its students are empowered to discern the future and make a difference within their respective organizations. The outcome of the program enables the student to become a lifelong learner in the areas of Strategic Management, Ethical Leadership, Total Quality Management, Cultural Diversity, Leading in Changing Economies, Effective Team Processes, and Leadership for the Future.

A prominent feature of the MSM program is its mentoring process. Students are

Letters From the Eye of the Storm

September 8, 1992

Dear Bob,

You will find enclosed a little bit of Regis that survived Hurricane Andrew. I found the shattered piece of my back window among the shattered windows, roofing tiles and power lines. The car was a total loss.

The storm itself is something that I'll never forget. The storm's fury was incredible! From 3:00 am August 23 to 7:00 am my family spent what seemed like an eternity in a bathroom. The noise of 140/160 mph sustained winds was deafening. The wind was gusting over 200 mph. We could hear our roofing tiles rolling off the roof, our windows were shattering everywhere.

Once the storm had passed the amount of destruction was unbelievable. We lost our home, which needs to be gutted and restored and the roof needs to be replaced. The good thing is that my family survived untouched. The sad thing is that thousands of people have been left homeless. We are fortunate to have family in Miami, but the farm workers (migrants) in Homestead and Florida City have nothing. I would like to suggest that the university, if at all feasible, start a relief effort for those storm victims which might be coordinated through the Archdioceses of Miami. We're still trying to reason with hurricane season.

Sincerely,

Ed Callahan '79

Dear Rev. Clarke,

My husband and I would like to thank you and the Regis family for your concern and prayers for Tim. He is fine and has not suffered any hardship due to Hurricane Andrew. He does say, he will never stay for another.

He and his brother evacuated their home and stayed at ours (we were up North). They boarded up our home and from what the neighbors tell us, they were more than helpful with the clean-up.

We all thank you for your offer of assistance and once again for your prayers.

Sincerely,

Dr. and Mrs. John Huier

October 9, 1992

Dear Father Clarke,

Thank you for your thoughtful letter of concern and your offer of assistance and prayers. We were very fortunate. Other than flooded streets, uprooted trees and roof damage to our medical office building our situation was minor.

Unfortunately, other areas nearby were not so blessed. It will be weeks before power is restored to several rural and bayou areas.

Again, thank you for your expression of concern and I know everyone appreciated all the prayers and offer of support.

Sincerely,

October 5, 1992

Dear Father Clarke,

Your beautiful letter of September 4, 1992 was just the right touch.

I am a Regis graduate who now lives and works part time at St. Andrew Towers, a large retirement HUD facility, sponsored by the Archdiocese of Miami.

May the Lord be praised, we suffered only high winds and lots of debris from fallen trees and broken branches. Our maintenance crew took down almost 2,000 window screens. Flying screens are deadly, and they cannot be put up until after hurricane season which is about the last of November.

I posted your letter on the bulletin board, and it was delightful to see the residents approach the board, adjust their glasses, read, discuss the letter, then nod approval.

We appreciate the fact that the president of a university took time to write. Thank you Father.

You'll not get students from St. Andrew's, (our ages are 62 to 94) but they may remember to mention Regis University to their grand children and great grand children.

Thank you again, and may the Lord bless your every endeavor.

Sincerely,

Sister Gabrielle Skupier

Adult Learning at Regis:

Why it Works

Serving adult learners with innovative, professional and personalized education has elevated Regis University's School for Professional Studies (SPS) to the forefront of adult education in Colorado and across the country. Presently, over 7,000 adult learners are working toward undergraduate and graduate degrees at eleven different Regis University campuses in Colorado and Wyoming, as well as on-site at several corporations.

Adult learning at Regis University began in a recognizable way in the late 1970s. However, Regis' involvement with the adult learner dates back even further. In the 1940s, Regis offered night classes for business men and women in downtown Denver.

"Our adult learning programs are rooted in a noble tradition. When we expanded our adult learning segment in 1977, we clearly tapped into a need that was not being served. There was a tremendous opportunity for the institution to serve current and future leaders," according to Dr. Allan L. Service, acting academic vice-president for Regis University.

The concept for the current adult education emphasis was born in 1977 in Colorado Springs. Regis President David M. Clarke, S.J. and his assistant

John Brennan began to examine adult education and discovered that there were better ways that Regis could serve the adult learner. Brennan was the original dean of what was then termed Special Programs at Regis College. RECEPI (Regis Career Education Program), a degree completion program, was initiated in 1978 to serve military students and adult civilians in Colorado Springs. It offered majors in business and computer science and a limited number of minors.

The RECEP II program was established in Denver one year later to meet the needs of working adults who wanted to complete a bachelor's degree in accelerated courses offered in the evenings. In 1982, Dr. William Husson joined RECEP II as program director. He is currently acting academic dean of the School for Professional Studies.

"The approach that most institutions around the country used for adult education was simply to immerse adult learners into the existing traditional processes," Dr. Husson said. "The Regis approach is significantly different. We have completely redefined the learning process to accommodate the adult learner. We created systems in a number of our programs so that adults could both accelerate and focus their learning. We felt this approach was more accommodating to the adult life and learning style."

The continued success of the program and its heart and soul is in the quality of its learners and its faculty. "We are dealing with people who bring a level of self-awareness and self-direction to the educational process. We consider the adult learner a partner in the learning enterprise," said Dr. Service.

In conjunction with having students who want to learn, there is a faculty as dedicated as the students they teach.

Dr. Harvey Rothenberg, an instructor in the RECEP II program, established a scholarship fund in 1983 with a portion of his salary. The scholarship goes to a RECEP student entering a Regis graduate program. "I enjoy teaching and the students give me so much back, I decided I wanted to give them something in return."

It is not uncommon to find such dedication among the faculty in the School for Professional Studies. Early on, it was understood that a very special group of people would be needed to expedite quality learning to the adult student.

Dr. June Twinan has been a RECEP professor for twelve years and is close to teaching her one hundredth class. "Adult education at Regis works because it's based on adult learning theory. Adults learn by connecting old experiences to new ones and participating in the classroom. Regis really tries to make it work for adults. They know the students have other obligations, jobs to go to and families to support. What happens in the Regis classroom can be magical. Once you've tasted it, you're hooked," expressed Dr. Twinan.

"The faculty is top notch," Dr. Husson emphasized. "Most of our faculty are full-time practicing professionals in the disciplines they teach. We were looking for people who are experts and are willing to use their expertise in the classroom to facilitate learning. You have the combination of the student's experience and the faculty's expertise coming together in a very effective way. It's a winning combination."

The adult learner and the part-time student make up more than half of the students enrolled in colleges and universities in the United States today. This trend could become more pronounced as social and economic strata evolve and public higher education systems have additional constraints put on them.

Rich Gonzales, fire chief for the City of Denver, graduated from the RECEP program in 1991 with a B.A. in Business. "As a working adult, Regis was the best opportunity for me to continue my education. It was very accommodating to my schedule. The classes facilitated an opportunity for me to work at my own pace. I could plan out my schedule for a year and not worry about a class being unavailable. When you're a working adult, time is very important."

RECEP courses are completed within a five-week or eight-week period, meeting one or two times per week. By taking a single course at a time, the student has an opportunity for in-depth concentration on the subject. While the accelerated model is designed to allow degree completion in a shorter period of time, it also increases independent learning outside the classroom environment.

Serving the non-traditional adult students of Regis University is consistent with the Jesuit mission and the mission of Regis University. Dr. Service notes, "Adult learning has clearly become central to the University's mission. If you think of the Regis mission as developing leaders in the service of others, we are very consistent. We serve a different group of leaders and poten-

Regis University student, Luis Diaz, puts the finishing touches on Romero House.

Students Serve Community Through Romero House

Fr. Vince O'Flaherty is about to realize a dream. He will be living and working at Romero House, a new Jesuit venture in which Fr. O'Flaherty, five students, and a house manager will live among and work with the Hispanic families in Our Lady of Guadalupe Parish in Northwest Denver.

In describing his inspiration for Romero House, Fr. O'Flaherty quotes Fr. Jon Sobrino, S.J. in his May 1990 Commencement Address at Regis...

"I will also say, that a university should make the option for the poor. This means that as a university you look at the totality of our reality, not from the top but from below. I am sure you will learn more - more about your own country, the United States, if you go to the Hispanics or to the Black community or wherever. You will see more and better, and that is important for a university."

The five students at Romero House (Lauri Harris, Renee Janssen, Hung Pham, Luis Diaz, and Christine Adriolo) were chosen from a group of applicants last Spring. Mike McManus, a 1992 graduate, has been hired by Regis as house manager.

Romero House is located near 34th and Vallejo, just one mile away from Our Lady of Guadalupe, where students will be working on internships within the parish.

Much of the furnishings for the house came from a "shower" held on the Lowell Campus. Faculty, staff, and fellow students pitched in to supply "gently used" appliances, furniture, and fixtures.

Highlander Subscriptions Now Available to Alums and Friends

When Jeff Basler, an '83 alum, visited Regis and saw a copy of The Highlander, he was surprised to learn that the 73-year tradition of the student newspaper, The Brown and Gold, had come to an end with the name change.

In fact, the 1992-93 school year began with the renewal of an old tradition that dates back to the earliest years of Regis University. During the period of December 1888 to spring of 1893, the student newspaper was known as The Highlander and had a circulation of 600 copies published by students of Regis University (then Sacred Heart College).

One-hundred and four years later, the tradition of a student-run newspaper continues with Editor-in-Chief Del Stark and Faculty Advisor Dr. Janellen

Del Stark, Editor-in-Chief, Highlander

Hill-Smith. The change to university status last year created the window of opportunity for The Highlander "to build on its tradition. It is our hope that the newspaper inspires faculty and students to think and to react to issues," Stark said. He went on to explain that "everytime we publish an issue of the paper we work on one section at a time, building it to its full potential." The Highlander staff is made up of "students from various backgrounds which combine to give the newspaper its character", according to Stark, who extends an invitation to all alumni and friends to subscribe to The Highlander and become re-acquainted with the Regis University students of today.

Doty Named 1992 Faculty Lecturer of the Year

Associate Professor of Philosophy, Stephen Doty, was chosen as the Regis College Faculty Lecturer of the Year for the 1992 - 93 school year.

Dr. Doty's lecture, entitled "Poiesis/Noesis: The Postmodern Question of the Ethical," recounted the history of the quarrel between poetry and philosophy, with a focus on the ethical. He reviewed what philosophy and literature both have to teach us about the ethical.

The relationship between ethics and poetry is not new to Dr. Doty. He has been asking this question for the last three to four years and spent his two-year sabbatical researching it.

Dr. Doty has been a member of the College faculty for 11 years, and has taught in the RECEP program for 10 years.

Regis Athletic Hotline (RAH)

The Regis University Athletic Department has added a new feature to the Sports Information Office this year. The Regis University Sports Information Hotline became available on Monday, September 14th.

The 24-hour hotline will feature scores, records, and schedule highlights. The number for RAH is 458-4201.

"This is another service that we wanted to have in place as we improve the scope and direction of our department," said Director of Athletics Tom Dedin. "We certainly appreciate the help of the Adolph Coors Company and our Ranger Boosters in getting this project off the ground."

School for Professional Studies Offers A New Accounting Major

The Regis Career Education Program (RECEP) is offering a new major. This Fall, students on the Lowell and Southeast campuses began courses to earn a major in accounting. The Accounting Major plus several more Regis electives are designed to prepare a student for the CPA examination.

Regarding the addition of the new degree, Director of RECEP, Steve Jacobs says, "We were overwhelmed with inquiries from people who wanted accelerated accounting courses and it is an area where people are re-careering. Also, our minor in accounting was very successful.

"Within the first few months of the program, 36 students have declared majors in accounting."

With the addition of this degree, RECEP now offers a total of three different majors: Accounting, Business Administration, Computer Information Systems, and eight minors.

The Mass of the Holy Spirit this year was celebrated on the Lowell Campus on September 10th. This year's theme, "In a Year of Decision, a Day of Challenge to Deeper Living," inaugurated the Faith and Justice Institute and also looked to the theme of World Youth Day by the International Youth Congress, "I Have Come so that You May Have Life, Life to the Full." An estimated 300 people attended the mass, held outdoors, and the picnic that followed.

coached through personal, interpersonal, management, and ultimately, global transitions.

These Regis University management and leadership degree programs are meaningful efforts to prepare their students with a sound foundation in business management/leadership education. The curriculums are student-centered, whereby students and faculty members jointly engage in learning. Further, the nature of these experiences emphasize small and large group discussion and problem-solving—lateral learning, where the students learn from each other, and vertical learning, where the students learn from the facilitator and the facilitator learns from the students. Interpersonal skill development and teamwork are a natural outcome of this learning process. The specific focus is on preparing managers and leaders for the global century and to create the necessary energy for a viable future for present and future generations.

In a changing world, in an election year, and in a business environment where the global picture being painted reflects international cooperation, the focus is on new partnerships and a new approach to thinking about what the picture will be. What the final picture might be, though, is now only a sketch.

One part of the picture is the role of Latin America and the United States as they enter into the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA). "We are witnessing the end of fundamentalist views which we thought were always right," said Belisario Betancur, former President of Colombia and founding owner of one of Colombia's largest publishers, Tercer Mundo Editores. "It took a long road and many mistakes to realize politically there are no dogmas. We are seeing the birth of new ideas for the United States and our countries."

Those new ideals, however, not only translate into the birth of new ideas for the countries involved, but also for the universities involved in sponsoring the North/South Conference. In the Spring of 1992, a joint venture began to form between the Critical Studies of the Americas Committee of the University of Colorado at Boulder and Regis University's School for Professional Studies. The effort was realized this fall with the North/South Conference which studied the globalization of the world economy and the vast changes in the Americas in the 1990's. The four-session conference, directed at the international business community, was limited to 100 participants at each session in an effort to encourage participation and a hands-on approach to understanding "North/South Relations, Globalization, and International Trade."

Among the 35 presenters at the conference were Betancur, Oscar Arias, recipient of the Nobel Peace Prize and President of Costa Rica from 1986-1990; Raul Alfonsin, president of Argentina from 1983-1989; Oswaldo Hurtado,

NORTH/ SOUTH CONFERENCE: STUDIES IN GLOBALIZATION

President of Ecuador from 1981-1984; and Michael Manley, Prime Minister of Jamaica from 1972-1980 and 1989-1990. Other participants in the conference were Pulitzer Prize winning author Carl Sagan; John Negroponte, United States Ambassador to Mexico; Mario Vargas Llosa, candidate for presidency in Peru in 1990; and Beatriz Paredes, General Secretary for the Institutional Revolutionary Party (PRI) in Mexico.

The cross-cultural approach to establishing relations between the countries of Latin America and the United States is creating an environment in which exciting opportunities exist for college students, universities, and countries to create partnerships and work together.

"This was a specific opportunity from an institutional perspective to do several things," according to Dr. Edward Cooper, Associate Academic Dean of The School for Professional Studies. "The North/South Conference was an opportunity to combine resources with the University of Colorado, which can then create a university to university affiliation that is rather unusual in this day and age. The partnership between two institutions and universities does not occur on a regular basis and it is a good opportunity for us to open that door for future activities."

Another important impact of the conference was the direct and indirect benefit to the participants and to the Regis community. According to Rev. Peter-Hans Kolvenbach, S.J., Superior General of the Society of Jesus, "Jesuit universities must seek education for responsible citizenship in the global village. There is a need to adapt the changing international culture in order to form men and women for others in the world community of the twenty-first century."

Responding to the encouragement of Fr. Kolvenbach, The School for Professional Studies has long tried to put the Superior General's words into action. With an international emphasis in the business administration major on both the undergraduate and graduate levels and the global themes that are interspersed throughout all courses, the recent collaboration with the University of Colorado at Boulder has further increased its network system.

"We integrate global ideas and global perspectives with a degree of internationalization throughout the curriculum and also in the faculty and staff knowledge base. Everybody will have some of that flavor embedded in their training and background and that will provide opportunities for people to go outside the country and outside the basic cultural perspectives," said Dr. Cooper.

The focus and discussion on internationalization and globalization has been carried into the classroom through the faculty and students that participated in the conference. Dr. Jane Wells, a professor in the Master of Science in Management (MSM) program, attended three of the four North/South seminars. "I was very impressed with the credentials of the presenters and the interaction and participation that occurred at the seminars. Rarely do you have an opportunity to talk to the presenters in a real and personal dialogue which is what occurred during lunch and dinner."

North/South Conference

The information and ideas brought back to the classroom, though, reveal the impact that the North/South Conference had on the participants. Wells explained that she brought back much more than concrete knowledge about the NAFTA agreement to her students.

"I shared with my students the ideas of common humanity and the feeling of reaching out in order to understand each other's cultures. I tell the students that multi-culturalism is a reality in our country and that it is important to be aware of individual paradigms. We have to be careful about stereotypes of cultures. Leadership cuts across different cultures and incorporates skills that vary from leader to leader and culture to culture," Wells said.

The picture of countries working together, universities combining resources, and faculty and students sharing ideas is slowly coming into focus as joint ventures are undertaken by countries, universities, and people to share their resources and open up new opportunities. While the full picture has yet to be drawn, many pieces are forming a colorful and cohesive piece of work.

The combined efforts of the University of Colorado and Regis University have created a wealth of opportunities for future endeavors that will bring attention to issues that affect students, faculty, and the important global outlook. The partnerships created by the North/South Conference will benefit the Regis University community today and well into the future.

tial leaders who are at a different stage of their careers and human development. Our role is to help them on their way to becoming leaders in their communities and their professions. Adult education allows the University to live its mission to its fullest potential by serving the educational needs of students of all ages," expressed Dr. Service.

The School for Professional Studies not only gives adults a practical way to finish their degrees, but also presents several program options. There are currently six undergraduate programs and seven programs available at the graduate level. SPS has extended its educational programs and classes to where people live and work by opening campus sites more convenient to the population centers. There are campuses throughout Colorado and Wyoming. This past August, Regis opened a campus in Glenwood Springs in conjunction with Colorado Mountain College (CMC). In January 1993, Regis will open at CMC's Alpine Campus in Steamboat Springs and in August 1993 at CMC's Breckenridge Center.

The growth of the School for Professional Studies has been impressive. In 1991-92, course registrations in the School for Professional Studies grew to over 25,000 and total revenue exceeded $14 million.

"Regis hit on the right idea at the right time. Fr. Clarke's hunch was right. A number of adult working students had a great desire to finish their baccalaureate degrees and never had a practical way to do it. The programs at Regis afforded options that weren't available at other colleges and universities in the area," said Dr. Husson.

In September, Regis University and Coors Brewing Company celebrated their five-year partnership, which has been recognized for its innovation by the Peter Drucker Foundation. Beginning in 1987, Coors and Regis began a collaborative partnership to bridge the gap between an academic institution and a corporation. The partnership created an environment where employee/students could explore their education options and advance their professional development. Today, Regis also has similar partnerships with AT&T and Storage Tek.

A new breed of partnerships with other higher education institutions is also happening in the School for Professional Studies. In the last four years, Regis has developed partnerships with academic institutions from around the country. Lewis University in Chicago, Emmanuel College in Boston, North Carolina Wesleyan in Raleigh, Detroit College of Business and Davenport College of Business in Grand Rapids have approached Regis for its expertise in adult education. "Their particular focus is on the RECEP accelerated undergraduate business degree. We basically become their consultants and show them how to do the whole integrated system. It's a great compliment when another institution recognizes your leadership in the field and wants to be a part of what you're doing," said Dr. Service.

The School for Professional Studies provides an opportunity for people who felt their education was finished and an opportunity to complete a degree was lost. "It is so exciting to see people who thought they didn't have a chance to have an education, put themselves back into the mainstream and find out that all education really changes their lives," Dr. Husson explained. "For us to have the opportunity to allow that to happen and to be instrumental in making changes in peoples' lives is a luxury afforded to very few people."

Dear Alum,

Regis is happy to provide this report on the Alumni Census which was conducted this past year. The response rate of 24% represents a total of 4,582 alumni of Regis College (RC), School for Professional Studies (SPS), School for Health Care Professions (SHCP) and Loretto Heights (LH). The results are very representative of our alumni body and I'm certain you will enjoy reviewing the findings.

An overwhelming percentage of alumni who returned their census forms praised the education they received at Regis or Loretto Heights. I am very pleased with the positive perspective the alumni have of Regis and the enthusiasm expressed for the future of the institution. The results will serve the Alumni Board well as we are currently planning the future direction of the Alumni Association.

Many alumni provided additional comments and it would be great to have the room to publish all responses. Unfortunately, since that is impossible, we have selected a few representative responses for this report. Both the favorable and the unfavorable feedback will be taken to heart and will be used constructively to help build a stronger Regis University and Alumni Association.

I trust you will enjoy reading this report as much as I did! Thanks to all of you who participated in this census.

Cordially,

William J. Fortune '69

H Stephen B. Jamison HEALTH CARE NEEDS MAJOR SURGERY, NOT BAND-AIDS

In this election year, health care has been rediscovered by those running for office – any office. I would suggest, however, that with the votes now counted, the concern over health care will leave the front pages of the newspapers and be relegated by politicians to the four-year back burner.

Why? Because all of the candidates missed the mark and their plans cannot work. They talked about cost containment. They talked about covering the 37 million working Americans who simply cannot afford to get health care insurance. And they talked about the United States having the highest quality health care system in the world.

To begin, two of these three assumptions are wrong. First of all, we should not be talking about cost containment. It won't work. Cost containment has become a euphemism for "we can't do anything about it." We should be talking about cost reduction. I agree we need to find a way to cover the 37 million working poor. However, and this is a tough one for politicians to accept, we no longer have the best health care system in the world. If you look at the commonly used measures of life expectancy, infant mortality and morbidity rates, the United States is no longer the best in the world in any of those categories.

The politicians proposed band-aids, something that sounds good to get them the votes they need. As Americans, we are bombarded with political rhetoric, so we recognize the promises for what they are. Unfortunately, our health care problems won't get healed with band-aids. Major surgery is required.

The surgery needs to reconstruct our focus from what the politicians want to what the consumer of health care needs. In short, we need to develop a TRUE HEALTH CARE SYSTEM that provides quality of care improvement, cost reduction (not containment) and universal coverage. It can be done.

If you take the generally accepted position that a "system" is based on shared goals and common objectives, then what we have now is not a system. What we have now is seven separate sets of players, each a system unto themselves.

The seven groups now operating in health care are:

- Physicians (preoccupied with maintaining and increasing income levels)
- Hospitals (must recapture uncovered costs)
- Nurses (the real health care system to the patient, but still fighting the battle for recognition)

- Insurance companies (don't want to insure sick people)
- Pharmaceutical Companies (concerned with making money. Their bottom lines are significantly higher than most other industries)
- Government Agencies (a bureaucratic nightmare)
- Consumer (most important group, but has no voice and is the victim of the so-called system)

There is absolutely nothing that unifies these groups. So the problem in health care is not our system. The problem is we don't have a system. The solution is to build one. To truly accomplish that, we must redesign and redefine our health care approach.

The health care problem in this country is not one that is amenable to solution by people who have a vested interest in maintaining the status quo. If you approach the issue as a management and system problem, you reveal a number of absurdities and practices that would bankrupt any company in the world.

The solution has to be demonstrably acceptable to the American public, using a model that has some previous history of success. One recommendation several months ago came from economist Milton Friedman.

His argument is simple and straightforward. His notion is that we establish a system along the lines of the Federal Reserve Board where there is a central agency overseeing health care akin to the board of governors of the federal reserve system.

Working from that concept, the goals of improved quality of care, cost reduction and universal coverage would become the responsibility of a quasi-government, private corporation like the Federal Reserve.

This corporation would have three responsibilities:

1. It would manage health care in the United States the same way the Federal Reserve's Board of Governors manages the money supply.
2. It would assure universal coverage and quality improvement while creating an environment of competition to achieve efficiencies in the system.
3. It would serve as the watchdog organization for the seven groups involved in health care, eliminating the current peer review process which is, in reality, "the fox watching the hen house."

And where will the money come from for universal coverage? With the establishment of this group to oversee health care, you would eliminate the necessity in full or in part for several dozen government agencies now involved in the health care bureaucracy. Conservative estimates suggest that these cuts would immediately free up nearly $80 billion in reduced overhead.

In addition, by monitoring quality improvement and taking it out of the peer review process, you would eliminate a major economic drain in the health care system – unnecessary treatment (doctors running every test imaginable to protect themselves from malpractice suits) and iatrogenic treatment (worsens patient condition or introduces new problems because of the treatment). Again conservative estimates, depending on whose numbers you use, indicate another $80 billion savings.

The $160 billion in initial annual savings, when properly invested and managed, is more than adequate to insure those individuals we now refer to as the "working poor."

I've just touched the surface of what needs to be done in health care. The hard reality is that the solution lies in major surgery and not in the band-aid approach suggested by nearly every politician running for office. A real solution will always be met with cynicism by most of the seven groups now participating in the health care industry. The one group that wants the change – the consumer of health care – needs to be the winner.

Letter to the Editor

Fr. David M. Clarke,

As a 1976 graduate of Regis College I was interested in Margaret McDonald's account of the many changes that occurred since she arrived on campus. All students, faculty and alumni can be proud of the growth and accomplishments of the Regis community. I join her in thanking you for your many years of dedicated service to Regis. However, I am sure that I join many of my contemporaries in questioning the accuracy of Dr. McDonald's rather dismal appraisal of the faculty and students she initially encountered.

The Regis that I remember was rich in many ways. There was a larger Jesuit community on campus than presently exists. I was very fortunate to have known so many of these fine men. Their influence enabled me to grow intellectually as well as spiritually. The lay instructors were generally quite good; any apparent deficiencies could partially be attributed to comparing them to their Jesuit colleagues. As for my fellow students, we all were in need of intellectual, spiritual and yes, even cultural development, but after all that's the reason we chose to attend Regis. Despite the bleak picture painted by Professor McDonald, I still value my college experience.

It seems to me that her letter contains a good measure of the cultural and intellectual elitism that seems to be popular in higher education these days. With that type of attitude, I think it would be difficult to act in the service of others. I'm as happy as anyone to know that at long last there is "music at Regis". However, as I recall, there was a good deal of music at Regis, I'm afraid she just did not hear it playing.

I do want to commend the editor for publishing this letter despite the risk of alienating a portion of the alumni. Of course, Dr. McDonald has the advantage of witnessing the changes that have occurred. At the same time there are many of us that attest to the value of the education we received at Regis on a daily basis.

Keep up the good work and may God continue to bless us all.

Very truly yours,

John P. Gargulak
